XM radio was a gift to me from my 19 year old very savvy daughter to her relatively cool but very sceptical father. Wasn't interested.....until turning it on for the first time. Never turn it off, and neither will the rest of the world. There will always be a place for commercial airwave radio, especially for emergency purposes, but satellite radio will ultimately take over like air conditioning replaces the fan.

Personally, I would listen exclusively to XM if it were not for ball games. The selections are excellent, and the listener has a choice on whether they want to hear foul language, moral decline, government hatred, or simply be entertained with very good programming.

Of COURSE the National Association of Broadcasters wants to dictate what we hear on the radio. They already control what we see on television and read in the newspaperapers. I am certain that the internet and XM radio must just kill them to recognize how little control they have and how difficult it may be to get it. Keep up the good work, and on this Memorial Day remember that everbody wants to mess with our few remaining freedoms. Hang tight. Based on what we now hear on public airwave radio, I don't think the FCC gives much thought to what we would like to hear anyway.
